THE FUTURE OF WORK IS NOW!

The world of work across the globe continues to undergo rapid change and disruption arising from digital and technological advances, including automation, artificial intelligence, big data, IoT (internet of things), as well as generational shifts, and new societal dynamics such as the gig economy. Businesses and workers are adapting and need to continue to do so because jobs are being fundamentally re-designed or cease to exist. These factors will re-shape everybody’s lives as well as bring new challenges and opportunities to society and businesses alike. Major modifications in terms of capabilities and skills are necessary in the labour market. Consequently, all aspects of employment will need to be adapted through policies that will allow businesses to create more and better work opportunities, increase productivity, enhance competitiveness, as well as strengthen sustainable growth.

IOE is at the forefront of global debate on the Future of Work to represent business and employers’ perspectives on digitalisation, innovation, new business models, and all related changes affecting employment and the world of work.

Businesses cannot afford to be idle - businesses need to ‘disrupt’ before they are ‘disrupted’!

Following the successful Global Conference on the Future of Work, which took place in Madrid in 2017, the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) is now joining forces with the Confederation of Asia-Pacific Employers (CAPE) and the ASEAN Confederation of Employers (ACE) to host the 2020 edition, with the generous support of the European Union. A great way to kick start the IOE’s centenary celebrations!

Come and join us to share, connect and hear inspiring views on the Future of Work from industry leaders, IOE, ILO, international agencies and employer and business-membership organisations from around the world!
CONCEPT NOTE

Background

This Global Summit is co-organised by IOE, CAPE and ACE. IOE represents employers’ views in Future of Work policy debates at national, regional and international levels, notably at the UN, ILO, B20, OECD (in support of Business at OECD) and various international forums. IOE has also been in the forefront on this topic in many regions of the world.

There are some important questions to be asked: How are sectors adapting? What are the needs of business? How are small and medium sized enterprises (SMEs) coping, considering that they are operating on much smaller budgets than large companies and multinationals? How can businesses boost their competitiveness and productivity through innovative work processes and advanced talent pipeline development? Can employer and business-membership organisations (EBMOs) help governments tackle informality and if so, how? How can we move from these political discussions and turn policy recommendations into concrete actions?

Target audience for participation

The Summit will bring together between 50 and 70 participants from EBMOs and companies from around the world, including from Least Developed Countries and Small Island States.

Expected outputs

- A report on EBMO and enterprise responses to the Future of Work;
- A toolkit on how EBMOs can approach the Future of Work discussions; and
- Yearly monitoring of commitments and work by IOE member organisations on preparing themselves and their members for the future of work.

Expected outcomes

- A review of work being done by IOE member organisations;
- EBMOs learn about the latest trends affecting the Future of Work from key experts;
- EBMOs from around the world are given international space to present the work being done in their respective organisations in preparation for the Future of Work;
- EBMOs exchange new information since the IOE’s Future of Work event in 2017 in Madrid, Spain; and
- There is stronger engagement by EBMOs on the Future of Work at national level.
Format and working methods:

- Davos-style conference with three parallel sessions under the Chatham House rule as follows: These parallel sessions will last 1.5 hours in total. The participants will be divided into three groups. For each discussion topic, there will be one facilitator and one rapporteur, who will note down the ideas proposed by the participants on the given topic. Every 30 minutes, the participants will move to another topic. This means all the participants will get a chance to contribute their views and ideas on each of the three topics. At the end of the session, the facilitators will report on the ideas proposed under each topic (in Plenary).

- The outcomes of the parallel sessions will be used to create the toolkit mentioned above.

- An evaluation will be made before and after the meetings to capture participants’ comments.
